FANNY FERN.

296 pp. 16mo. Price 75 cents. Full Gilt, $1 25.

From The New-York Tribune:

"Fanny Fern has few superiors among American authoresses has a writer for young people. Her best qualities of head and heart are always called into exercise in this department of composition. Her sympathies with children are true and lively, and hence she possesses a rare instinctive tact in finding the way to their hearts. The short sketches, in which she excels rather than in labored narratives, are in perfect accordance with their hearts. Her language, too, a choice and effective, consisting to a great eatent of the good, short, motherly, Saron words, which give such a hearty, home-bred expression to style. In writing for children, the exuberant vivasity which often runs wild in her more ambilious performances, is toned down to more quiet and delicate accords, delighting the young ear with sweet melodies. The contents of this volume, we think, are not surpassed by any productions of ther pop. Along of the pieces are mere familiar records of personal experience, and possess a greater sharm on that account. The pathon and tenderness which mark none of the beautiful and celiant to readers of every age, and at a sketches comment them to readers of every age, and a state the comment them to readers of every age, and a state the content of the late of holiday sitts."

From The Bosten Transcript:

"This gern of a volume is given to the public in the beat style of the publications of the publishers. There are forty-five takes or stories, every one of which will be read with delight by the young, for whom the volume was especially written, in response young, for whom the volume was especially written, in response young, for whom the volume was especially written, in response young, for whom the volume was especially written, in response young, for whom the volume was especially written, in response young, for whom the volume was especially written, in response young, for whom the volume was especially written, in response young,
